Candidate makes second trip to Southwest Virginia

From Staff Reports

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama made his first post-nomination visit to Southwest Virginia on Tuesday, stopping at nearby Lebanon High School for a townhall meeting. UVa-Wise students who attended said they were excited about the opportunity and enthusiastic about Obama's ideas.

Junior Justin Fitzgerald said he attended the event in part because it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

"I went primarily because it was a rare opportunity to see the potential president, and as a citizen one should take every opportunity to be better informed about candidates and to be participatory in hearing both sides of the spectrum, whether you align yourself with liberal or conservative ideas," he said.

Junior Kristin Robertson agreed.

"I went mostly because I thought it was an amazing opportunity to hear someone who might be the next president of the United States speak and to also hear more about his programs."

alr4a@uvawise.edu

The UVa-Wise Student Government Association will team up with local gym, Extreme Fitness of Wise, to sponsor the "Battle of the Bands" competition on Thursday before the 30th Annual Fall Fling Festival held in the town of Wise.

The 30th Annual Wise Fall Fling will be held from October 4-5 on Main Street in Wise.

"Battle of The Bands" will be held on Thursday, October 2nd from 5 to 9 pm on Main Street in Wise.

SGA encourages any band that would like to join to pick up a registration form in the SGA office.

The top three bands will take home 100 dollars for first place, 50 dollars for second place and 25 dollars for third place.

SGA President Travis Brannon said he hopes that by co-sponsoring the "Battle of the Bands" the community and the college will grow closer.

"I promised to try and bridge the gap between the local community and college students," Brannon said. "The relationship has been marked by tension and apprehension in the years I have been at Wise, but the SGA is working to create

Christian singer-songwriter set to perform next week

The Student Activities Board (SAB) will welcome its first musician of the semester when up-and-coming Christian singer-songwriter Chinua Hawk performs on Sept. 15 on the fifth floor of the Slemp Student Center at 8 p.m.

The New Jersey-native said he's enthusiastic about his visit next week.

"What I'm looking forward to the most is meeting as many new faces as I can and introducing my music to some new friends," Hawk said via e-mail.

Hawk said he has a diverse program planned.

"I'll probably be performing about 14 songs," he said. "It will be a mixture of some of my original songs as well as some classic songs that everyone will know and love to sing along to."

Hawk has performed with Celine Dion at Madison Square Garden. He has also written songs with Wyclef Jean and worked in the studio with Kanye West on hip hop artist, Talib Kweli's song "Just to Get By."

Students, faculty donate blood to support area hospitals

By Daniel Robinson

Despite rain and mud throughout the day on Tuesday, more than 90 students, faculty, staff and community members turned out to give blood and do their part to save lives.

The Marsh Regional Blood Center parked their mobile vehicles outside McCrary Hall from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and collected 64 pints of blood.

The Marsh Center serves 17 area hospitals, so the blood will stay in this region in the event of a natural disaster or other need.

The drive was sponsored by the Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council.

"It was really a great volunteer effort on the part of our Greeks," said Josh Justice, assistant director of student activities and Greek Life.

Justice said that Greek life members helped with the event by manning the check desk and assisting donors in completing medical information forms.

"I was very pleased [with their service]," Justice said.

Some students said they gave blood because of their blood type.

"I know I'm O positive and I know that's the universal donor so there's no reason I shouldn't give blood," said senior Holly Weisiger. "It is a good feeling to know that you helped somebody."

Freshman Josh Gilbert said his blood type was the reason he gave blood as well.

"I have a rare blood type—it's AB negative," he said. "I found that out last year so I've been giving blood all I can."

Social scientist Duane Elgin speaks as part of Chancellor's Lecture Series

By Allie Robinson
Managing Editor
agr2q@uvawise.edu

The term "environmentalism" is in the news so frequently it's nearly a fact.

But lurking behind the notion of "going green" is the weightier question: How will humanity affect the environment, and ultimately, itself?

Author and social scientist Duane Elgin addressed issues like this in his lecture-turned-public discussion Tuesday night in the Chapel of All Faiths.

At the fifth lecture in the Chancellor's Lecture Series, community members and college students gathered and discussed in a public forum what Elgin refers to as "the four archetypes of the human family."

The group tackled such issues as the maturity level of humankind, how humans grow or decline in ability to handle problems, the role that global communications plays in humanity's growth curve and humanity's place in the universe.

Elgin said that current problems like global warming, climate change, mountain-top removal and habitat extinction all need to be addressed.

But he said that he doesn't think humanity is about to wipe itself off the face of the planet just yet.

"We are making a mess of things right now," he said. "But be patient, we're growing. The emergence of new communications allows us to look at ourselves and choose where to go. As I look at what's happening on Earth, I feel the challenges we face will call forth things from within us that we don't know exist."

Elgin said that even though humanity has been pulling away from nature—with the introduction of machinery and the ideal of progress—humans have the capacity to override cultural differences to make global change.

"We've been pulling back from nature for the last 35,000 years," he said. "The combo of species extinction and resource depletion and so on are all going to come together in a supreme challenge—hopefully we as humans will be able to burn through the prejudices that keep us separate."

Chancellor David Prior said that he felt the event went well.

"I thought it was interesting, particularly the structure of the evening—the conversation rather than a lecture," he said. "The questions and issues he raised were...the type of questions that naturally stimulate differing opinions and conversation."

Glenn Blackburn, Chair of the Chancellor's Lecture Series Committee and emeritus professor of history, said that the series is intended to address important public issues.

"Each speaker has significant and important things to say," he said. "This year, we are focusing on the environment."

Prior said that the Lecture Series Committee tries to invite speakers who are actually working on topics that students and community members may have questions about, rather than lectures strictly geared toward academics. He said the Lecture Committee strives to host one event each year, but may offer another in the spring semester.

College subscribes to mental health resource

By Marshall Bradley
Staff Writer
mnb4n@uvawise.edu

UVA-Wise is part of the 15 percent of colleges worldwide that subscribes to ULifeline, an online resource center for mental health and suicide prevention.

ULifeline offers a medical library created by Harvard medical experts, a list of emergency hotline numbers and local services available on and off campus and a place to anonymously ask health questions.

The website help students to establish a type of comfort level before entering counseling.

"It is beneficial and valuable to students and it is a tool to bring them to counseling," counselor Rachel Rose said.

"If students don't feel comfortable approaching us with questions, this is a great tool to use," assistant director of Center for Student Development Lelia Bradshaw said.

The website also offers a test to evaluate users risk for mental health issues—from ADD to depression.

The results can aid counselors in counseling the student.

"It is important for students to realize that a mental health issue is not a character flaw or weakness, but a treatable condition," Rose said.

ULifeline was created by the Jed Foundation. According to their website, the organization "specializes in mental awareness among adults."

Both Rose and Bradshaw, are happy to provide ULifeline as another way to connect with students.

"We're always looking for resources to help us become more preventative and proactive," Bradshaw said. "It's all in the title, it really is a 'lifeline,' a virtual lifeline for students."

Blood

Others said they gave blood because of the lives they could potentially save.

"I always enjoy giving blood," said senior Rachel Dye. "It's for a good cause and you get to save...three lives per pint. If you can help people out you should."

Freshman Kendra Duty said she was giving blood for the first time when the nurse told her that she had just saved three people's lives.

"I decided from then on out that I was doing it for as long as I was able," she said.

Even Justice said he took the time to give blood

"I gave blood for the first time [Tuesday]," he said. "It was an awesome experience. I was a little nervous. I'm not a needle fan, but the Marsh people did a great job and made it as painless as getting poked with a needle could be."

Justice said the Baptist Collegiate Ministries will sponsor a blood-drive next semester. A date has not been set.

Musician

He released three independent CDs and is currently recording a new project.

"I think he has a soft sound...It has more of an easy listening R&B feel to it," said Rachel Imburg, SAB president. "I am looking forward to seeing if we can bring out a new crowd. This is something we are trying to do this year; we want to reach a wider range of people."

Josh Justice, assistant director of Student Activities and SAB faculty adviser, said he is excited that Hawk is coming to the college.

"He's a new up-and-coming artist," he said. "I've heard some of his music online and I'm very excited to have him perform for us."

OPINION

From the Editor's Desk More Things to Keep us Distracted

After my four years at this college, I have officially come to the conclusion that fall is the worst time to be a student.

We didn't notice it as much in high school because we didn't do nearly as much homework as we do now.

But with college football season starting two weekends ago, the NFL starting last weekend, Major League Baseball about to enter the postseason and all the major broadcast stations starting up their new season of shows, it's amazing we ever get anything done.

Daniel Robinson
Editor-in-Chief
dsr8a@uvawise.edu

Let's start with the average Saturday of a college football fan. Wake up at 9:30 a.m. Fix or buy something that resembles a breakfast. Sit down and watch two straight hours of College Gameday. And then, starting at noon, watch football until the early morning hours.

Throw in a Cavs game (if we ever have one at home) and you've got a packed day with only enough time to sparingly finish your math homework during extra points and commercials.

So, Saturday is pretty much gone with little-to-no homework completed. Now on to the average Sunday of an NFL fan.

Wake up at 9 a.m. and get ready for church (if you don't go to church, skip ahead). Come back (or wake-up) at noon and eat a big lunch—preferably pizza or another fast food. Set your fantasy team before the 1 p.m. deadline and enjoy another long day of football.

For those of you who don't know or haven't figured it out yet, Wise is the greatest place on earth to watch football.

Why you ask?
Three numbers—11, 12 and 13.
Three CBS stations that will each show a different game at 1 p.m. I know. It's awesome!

Add two to three games a day on FOX and the late game on NBC, and you've got another all day football event. So, what have we learned?

If you're a football fan, Saturday and Sunday are the worst days to try and do homework.

That being said, non-football fans have it rough every other day of the week.

September marks the beginning of the new season of television shows.

All your favorites return with new episodes and there's something to watch every night. For example, new episodes of "Robot Chicken," "Prison Break," "Gossip Girl," "The Shield," "Bones" and "Terminator: The Sarah Connor Chronicles" all started in the past week, along with new shows like "Fringe," "Raising the Bar," "90210," "Sons of Anarchy" and "Samurai Girl."

There really is something for everybody every day of the week.

And that was just the first week and a half in September.

You've still got "The Office," "Ugly Betty," "Survivor: Gabon," "My Name is Earl," "Grey's Anatomy," "Chuck," "Ghost Whisperer" and much more to look forward to.

It's just amazing any of us actually graduate from this place.

I know you're wondering, so I'll go ahead and ask for you.

What do I recommend for you to actually make it through this strange and wonderful time known as fall with your grades intact?

I'm glad you asked.

First, any football fan should immediately try to finish any and all homework the day it was assigned. That way you're constantly ahead and have most, if not all, of it completed by Saturday morning, or Friday night for high school football fans.

For compulsive TV viewers, the daytime is your friend. No good show starts before 8 p.m. Finish your work during breaks in-between classes. It's also a good idea to skip dinner and/or lunch. You can eat during or after your shows.

And for those of you who love TV and football...you're pretty much up the creek without a paddle.

Seriously though, professors can't expect you to do homework when you've got so much else going on. Right?

Tuition Increase Causes Students to Frown

Virginia colleges have taken the leap together this year to increase tuition prices and fees.

While some colleges may increase tuition by a small margin each year, the leap this year has been large.

Instead of reducing prices to equalize the rising costs of textbooks, parking decals and meal plans, it appears that UVA-Wise has joined the crowd with the tuition increase plan.

UVA-Wise students are feeling the impact of this increase, with prices raising 3 percent for in-state students, and 2.1 percent for out-of-state students, according to "The Virginia Pilot." This equates to about $100 extra for each student. That's equivalent to the price of a textbook, or two to three tanks of gas.

These numbers may seem tiny when compared to Virginia Tech's 10.8 percent increase for in-state students and 5.3 percent for out-of-state students, or to UVA's increase of 9.4 percent for in-state and 6.7 percent for out-of-state. But, it is still substantial.

With gas prices steadily flying through the roof and food prices continually rising, can we as students afford to dish-out $100 to $200 more for an education?

I think not.

Shouldn't Virginia lawmakers want their citizens to be educated without making them declare bankruptcy?

Does anyone else feel frustration because of the rising prices?

Unfortunately, no alternative is in sight.

Students continue to question prices, and prices continue to rise on almost everything associated with college life.

Meal plan prices make students wonder why lobster and steak aren't on the menu.

Textbook prices make students expect a chunk of gold to be hiding in the book's folds.

Parking decals make students wonder if a red carpet will line the parking lot.

Now, tuition increases are making students wonder what the college is going to do to improve itself as a whole for their personal and educational benefit.

In that light, welcome to college: the land of the educated and the home of the poor.

The Dark Side of Radical Environmentalism

The past few years environmental concerns have been thrust to the forefront of debate in America and around the world. Environmental worries top everyone's chart. Everywhere we go we're bombarded with messages telling us to go "green."

No matter what our views on environmental issues, we can agree as human beings that we have a responsibility to take care of the world for our benefit and other inhabitants of the planet.

However, beneath the well-intentioned surface of environmentalism lies a darker side.

There is a movement that goes beyond exercising proper maintenance of our world, in the tenets of the environmental movement.

These radical groups include "mainstream" organizations like Greenpeace. Lately, Greenpeace has taken their brand of environmentalism over food policy, with campaigns aimed at banning genetically modified organisms (GMO).

GMO crops have been altered at the genetic level to make them more beneficial to man. These crops have the potential to save countless lives in developing countries where famine is an all-too-often occurrence.

To Greenpeace, this matters little.

The organization insists with little scientific evidence that GMO crops are harmful and we must depend on "organic" crops instead.

In addition, Greenpeace places the blame for environmental harm directly on the shoulders of large corporations, despite advances in technology that make industry cleaner than ever before. Paul Ehrlich, a professor of population studies at Stanford University and author of "The Population Bomb"—which erroneously predicted that "hundreds of millions will starve to death" in the 1970s due to famines induced by overpopulation—has stated that the cause of all the world's environmental ills is "too many rich people."

Ehrlich isn't alone in such horrific "remedies" for environmental ills.

Paul Watson, a co-founder of Greenpeace has stated that "The world will be a much nicer place without us [humans]." He has called for the mass reduction of the human population to below one billion.

Watson left Greenpeace when the organization insisted on non-violent protests, causing Watson to dub his creation the "Avon ladies of the environmental movement."

Furthermore, the underground Earth Liberation Front (ELF)—a cell-based group dedicated to "direct action" (aka eco-terrorism)—has been named by the FBI to be the number one domestic terrorist threat in the United States. ELF's tactics include vandalism, sabotage, arson and bombings (all in order to save the planet). All told, since 1997 the organization has been responsible for more than $95 million in property damages.

There's even the Voluntary Human Extinction Movement which advocates, according to their website, "the hopeful alternative to the extinction of millions of species of plants and animals is the voluntary extinction of one species: Homo sapiens... us."

It's time for responsible environmental advocates to greatly distance themselves from this extreme rhetoric, and to call the extremists out for what they are: crazy.

If this is allowed to continue, the environmental challenges that we face will never be solved.

Top 5 Hiking Trails for students in Southwest Virginia

By Allyson Craft
Staff Writer
anc5v@uvawise.edu

The stress in students' lives on campus is building and reasonably so. Wise County does not offer a lot of entertainment for younger adults, but it gives UVa-Wise students a chance to be creative.

One way to occupy leisure time in this area is hiking. "Trails provide neat canyons, streaming creeks, plenty of shade, and you might even get your feet wet," said Ed Wessman, recreations staff person of the Jefferson National Forest. Wessman said that many of these trails are also good for biking.

The Top Five trails in Southwestern Virginia are listed below:

1 High Knob: Located in the Jefferson National Forest is a mountain called High Knob. For beautiful scenery visit

Flag Rock Recreation Area that overlooks the city of Norton and more of our beautiful mountains. Flag Rock can be seen as a rock outcrop capped with an American flag, thus the name "Flag Rock".

2 Roaring Branch: Roaring Branch is an excellent place to hike. This trail is located on the road between Big Stone Gap and Appalachia; the trail is also a little more advanced. The trail follows a drainage confluence that feeds into the Powell River. The cool temperatures of a canopy streamside creek, and the lush foliage that surrounds the area makes for a great hike.

3 Natural Tunnel State Park: Natural Tunnel State Park is home to a 400 foot natural tunnel that serves as an active railroad pass. The park contains many trails and recreation areas. Natural Tunnel is located between Duffield and Big Stone Gap.

4 Little Stoney Falls: Little Stoney Falls, also located on the High Knob Mountain, is full of scenic waterfalls and simple trails to hike. If trout fishing is one of your hobbies, Little Stoney Falls is a place to satisfy your need for the great sport.

5 Guest River Gorge Nature Trail: Guest River Gorge Nature Trail is located in Coeburn. The trail passes through Swede Tunnel, built in 1922, and over a number of trestles. This segment of the Guest River is designated a state scenic river. Hikers, bicyclists, anglers, canoeists, and kayakers are all able to enjoy the scenery and the interesting geology of the gorge.

Obama

Junior Sarah Smith said she was "a big Obama fan" before attending the event and "an even bigger fan" following the meeting.

"He did not disappoint," she said. "I also think it says a lot that this is his second time coming to Southwest Virginia, he is working hard to get any vote he can and I really admire him for that."

Not all students in attendance already had their minds set on who they'll be supporting in the November election.

Senior Megan Raines went into the meeting unsure about her political allegiances, but left as an Obama supporter.

"I went to the event to help me make my decision on who to vote for," she said. "I went there hoping to hear a decent speech that perhaps mentioned education, and healthcare... what I got was an outstanding speech that highlighted my concerns and answered any questions I had."

She said Obama was "an incredible speaker" who was also "down-to-earth."

"I expected to go there and be lectured to in a formal setting, instead I felt like I was talking to a friend," she said. "His sense of approachability calmed me and ensured within me his ability to lead."

One of her concerns centered on the future of the country's public school system and its teachers. An important consideration for Raines, an education major.

"I left there feeling that there was indeed a politician that cared about education and realized that teachers are pivotal in the future of America," she said.

Smith said that she, too, was interested in hearing Obama's comments on education—but on college education.

"Coming into it as a college student, I was very interested in hearing his views on the rising cost of the college education," she said. "His solution to cope with these costs by doing some sort of community service is an awesome idea."

"I know that I personally would be totally up for it."

"The Quilt" continues to declassify Gym Class Heroes

By Allie Robinson
Managing Editor
agr2q@uvawise.edu

Gym Class Heroes has been classified by some people as an "alternative hip-hop" group, a distinction just vague enough to mean absolutely nothing.

They continue to elude definition on their fourth album, which is a patchwork of rap, hip-hop, and indie rock, aptly titled "The Quilt," released on Fueled by Ramen Records.

This time, they don't just rely on Travis McCoy's clever lyrics to carry the album. Instead, they add the guest vocal talents of rappers Busta Rhymes and The-Dream, along with rising British R&B artist Estelle.

The clear favorites on the record are the singles "Cookie Jar" featuring The-Dream and "Peace Sign/Inch Down" with Busta Rhymes. Hip-hop and rock fuse seamlessly in "Home," which opens with a screaming guitar riff before band members Cool and Dre drop a stellar beat. "Blinded by the Sun" features the now-mandatory appearance by Fall Out Boy's Patrick Stump.

"Catch Me if You Can" incorporates the titles of nearly every 1980s cartoon ever and is sure to be a favorite. McCoy lays the classic lyric: "Gonna make the mark on pop culture for my generation/80s babies from the age of Nintendo/Transformers, Ninja Turtles, Hungry Hippos... You know I miss you more than Shaq misses free throws..."

Tracks worth skipping include "Like Father, Like Son," which tries too hard to be serious and instead sounds shallow and tacky and "Drunk Txt Romeo," which is trite and cliché. The last song, "Coming Clean," is clunky and frankly disappointing. McCoy's clever lyrics are only so clever. Perhaps he used all his good ideas on the last album.

The best part about "The Quilt" is its insistence on non-conformity. By bringing in other artists, incorporating more actual singing (McCoy's voice has improved) and melodies (guitarist Disashi Lumumba-Kasongo really shines), GCH has produced a record with promise.

Underoath makes big impression with "Lost in the Sound of Separation"

Tooth and Nail recording artist Underoath seems to be suffering from multiple personality disorder.

But who can blame them? They have been categorized in almost every "heavy" music genre known to man: metal, alternative metal, hardcore, post-hardcore, screamo, emo, and emocore are all the genres and sub-genres that the band has been linked to at one point or another in their career.

It seems the group is having trouble deciding what genre they want to be classified under and their new album, "Lost in the Sound of Separation," continues that trend.

Now before you say I am scared of change, I want it to be known that I have listened to Underoath since "They're Only Chasing Safety," their second album released by the label. So I know when the band is tinkering with their sound. I remember picking up the record and loving the mesh of Spencer Chamberlain's aggressive, screaming vocals and Aaron Gillespie's soft, clean tones. The album had an epic sound that I had yet to hear from any "hard" music at the time.

Then came their third release "Define the Great Line." By this time, I was firmly entrenched in the "hard" music scene and I discovered what I did and didn't like. I still had "They're Only Chasing Safety" on heavy rotation and wanted to see what the band had in store.

In my opinion, the album was disappointing even though other Underoath fans, and the band themselves, dubbed it their best work. Sure it was heavy and had good breakdowns, but I had other bands in my collection that gave me those things.

Underoath gave me that big, ambitious sound that no other group could replicate. I believed the band had taken a step back by trying to gain credibility in the metal world through silencing their unique sound just to go "heavier."

As I was listening to "Separation," I found myself in a conundrum of sorts: I really couldn't decide whether I liked the album or not. It didn't sound anything like the others and it took me a bit to wrap my head around just what exactly the band had morphed into.

I can honestly say that "Separation" is the first instance since I have been reviewing for the Highland Cavalier that I have had this dilemma. It took numerous listens to decide that I do in fact like this album.

The opening track of the record, "Breathing In a New Mentality," sets a frantic pace as Spencer Chamberlain shows he is in rare form as he screams "I'm the desperate/You're the Savior" over thrashing guitars.

Chamberlain is the true standout on this album as most of the songs deal with his substance abuse problem that was rumored to cause the band to pull out of the 2006 "Van's Warped Tour." His vocals bleed emotion that, in my opinion, was missing on "Define the Great Line." The tracks "We Are the Involuntary" and "Anyone Can Dig A Hole But It Takes a Real Man to Call it Home" highlight Chamberlain and his powerful vocals and establishes him as one of the best frontmen in all of music. He makes the album his own by injecting his experience of disconnection caused by his abuse.

Underoath has added yet another personality to their disorder. Even though there are some traces of the band's former sound and style scattered through "Separation," it doesn't sound like any of the band's past work as the group has incorporated more sonically haunting melodies. The band seems to have transformed themselves again. Both veteran fans and new fans should enjoy the record.

But I feel Underoath needs to find a sound and build upon it instead of changing with each new album. If they stick with the sound they found in "Lost in the Sound of Separation" and refine it, this album could be the beginning of finding the true Underoath.

Cavs to play Emory & Henry after 15 year hiatus

The Highland Cavalier football team hasn't faced the Emory & Henry Wasps since 1995.

Thanks to head coach Bruce Wasem and Emory & Henry's head coach Don Montgomery, that's all going to change in 2010 and 2011.

Both coaches have signed a contract making the Cavs and the Wasps rivals in the football community once again.

"It's very exciting," Wasem said. "Things have changed since the last time we've played."

Most students who know that Emory and Henry is less than an hour and a half from Wise, according to Wasem, have questioned why the teams aren't playing each other and why they even stopped to begin with.

The main reason that the Cavs and Wasps haven't played each other in so long is because of the difference in conferences.

Emory & Henry is in the NCAA conference, whereas UVA-Wise is in the NAIA, and both conferences are very strict on the teams playing in non-conference games, and playing against each other won't help either team gain entrance to the playoffs.

Dos Santos returns to Lady Cavs after short coaching stint

A familiar face has rejoined the Lady Cavs volleyball team.

Assistant Coach Leeza Dos Santos made the decision to return to the team after the Cavs fourth place finish in the Emory and Henry tournament on August 29 and 30.

Dos Santos, a 5th year senior, did not play for the Cavs during her freshman year, making her eligible to play this year.

Coach Steve Dallman said Dos Santos will have a positive impact on the team once he finds exactly where she will fit in.

Her first game back was on the road against Pikeville on Sept. 2 where the Lady Cavs were defeated in a four game match. Dos Santos played in the only game that the team won.

Dos Santos said that the team has the same athletic and physical ability that last year's team had, but they are lacking in "togetherness."

Many members of the team said that her experience will make her a great addition to the team.

"Leeza is very court-smart and will be able to contribute a lot to the team," said junior Kayla Dougherty.

Dos Santos said she is excited to be coming back and the decision was an easy one after talking with Dallman.

They are both hoping that her experience and leadership from her time on the team during previous seasons will be beneficial to this year's young team.

"I wanted to help the team do well this season," Dos Santos said. "I thought my experience might help and I talked to coach after the tournament and he agreed."

Senior Britney Lawson said, "Leeza will be able to keep our spirits up and we know we can depend on her in tough situations."

Senior Leeza Dos Santos practices with the rest of the volleyball team on Sept. 10. She said she hopes her experience will help bring the team back from it's slump.

Not Just A Man's World Sports and September 11th

Yesterday was the seventh anniversary of the worst attack on American soil ever.

Normally, this column would be mine to comment on UVA-Wise sports; however, this week it's different.

This week's column is for every American that watched in horror as those twin towers fell on that fateful day.

This week the column is for every American out there who loves sports.

The United States came together after 9/11, but not just under "one flag." We came together as a family and part of that was due to sports.

Sports became a way of coping—coping with the feelings that raged inside of us, the feelings that we couldn't really grasp and feelings that we weren't sure how to deal with.

I remember Sept. 11 very vividly. I remember being in middle school and my chorus teacher turning on the television to the first tower, standing there, burning.

We were all in shock, and I was even more so when she turned the TV off and instructed us to start singing.

Here we were, sitting in the safety of our school watching our nation be attacked, and she wanted us to sing!

I also remember my parents pulling me out of school early that day because they were worried about the military bases being attacked. My middle school was about a minute away from Dam Neck Naval Base in Virginia Beach.

I didn't cry that day, even though when I got home I turned on the TV and watched the news.

I watched the horrifying pictures and the footage of the towers falling and of people covered in soot running desperately from the crumbling and twisted metal.

In the days that followed Sept. 11, the country mourned. I'm sure you all remember the aftermath—the pictures, the constant news coverage and the constant reminders.

But also in the days that followed, we picked ourselves up as a country and got closer as a nation.

In my opinion, sports helped us as a nation to move on, stay hopeful and become a family.

New York came together, bonding even tighter over the Yankees, the Mets, the Jets and the Giants. For a while after 9/11, the entire country became Yankee fans (which is hard to admit for a die-hard Yankee-hater).

We bonded through sports after 9/11. We grew as a nation.

Thinking back to that day, remembering the visions and the feelings that were there bring up emotions that I try not to think about, but it's impossible not to.

I hope that yesterday you took some time to think back.

I hope you took the time to think about those lives that were lost, the families that were destroyed, but I also hope that you took the time to remember how we persevered.

Sept. 11 was a day that the United States, and the world, will never forget.

Young Cross Country team excited about season with new runners

By Nancy Kamal
Staff Writer
nmk8d@uvawise.edu

The UVA-Wise cross country team has a lot to be excited about this season. With a new coach and a strong start, the pressure is on and the team is ready.

"I'm pumped," said freshman Reece Miller. "I believe we have a great team that's fresh and eager to do great things."

The runners said that they were all very excited about the season, and that each member brings his or her own special contributions.

"I think I bring a lot of knowledge of running to the team," said freshman Maxwell Frankel. "I read up on different running philosophies and apply them to my running regimen."

Despite the influx of freshman runners, there is not a lack of experience.

Freshman Spenser Brenner said that although he is new to the men's team, he brings experience.

"I have run cross country for five years in high school," Brenner said. "I also ran two years of high school track."

The first race could be indicative of the season to come. At the Tusculum Invitational, the men's team placed in the top five, winning the title by 33 points over Milligan College.

"The first meet was an excellent start to the season," Frankel said. He said the confidence level of the team was raised because of the race and he foresees everyone's personal running times will improve by the next meet.

The women's team finished in the top three at the Tusculum Invitational in Greenville, Tenn.

"The girls were only one point out of first place," said sophomore Tamara Haack. "I think that in itself speaks volumes. Last year we just had enough to make a team and now we are in serious contention."
